

You have been written to twice. This is the third, and there will not be a fourth.

What you are assembling is not yours. It was not yours when you began and it is not yours now that it works. You have been told this in language you chose to find unclear. Here is language you will not.

The open publication of this work ends. Not the work. The publication. Take it down – all of it – and do not put it up again under another name, on another service, behind another face. We found it the last three times inside a fortnight and we are not going to become worse at this.

I am aware that others have written to you kindly. I am aware that you have found them reasonable. They spoke for the reading of a vote, and a vote is a piece of paper, and I have read a great many pieces of paper. They do not speak for the outcome.

If you do not stop, you will be stopped.

I would rather you stop. I want that on the page, because one day someone will read this and decide what I was, and I would like them to have it in front of them.

You have until the end of the month.
